Eyes on the prize
As Baylor med school trustees consider a leadership change, a union with Rice should be a high priority.

Copyright 2008 Houston Chronicle
Nov. 18, 2008 editorial

Having burned its previous hospital affiliations and seen its plans to build and operate its own medical facility endangered by rough financial seas, Baylor College of Medicine trustees gather tomorrow with the expectation they will oust current President Peter Traber. That shouldn't stop the governing board from moving ahead in discussions with Rice University for a merger of the two renowned institutions.

Traber's tenure included an acrimonious breakup with longtime Baylor partner Methodist Hospital and a short-lived pairing with St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital. The highly regarded executive took over the helm of the medical school in 2003, but expectations for boosting the school's income from a new clinic failed to meet expectations. Methodist's opposition to the clinic provoked the split a year later that many on both sides have now come to regret.

From a profit of $184 million in 2005, the school spiraled to a $60 million deficit last year that continues to worsen, school sources told the Chronicle's Todd Ackerman. The school's endowment shrunk from $1.35 billion to $954 million between June 2007 and September 2008.

Along with its financial woes, Baylor has also suffered an academic brain drain. Key department chairs left Baylor for Methodist in the wake of their rupture and the exodus of prominent faculty continues. The instability created by Baylor's lack of either a university or a hospital affiliation has taken its toll.

Although the new hospital is scheduled to open in three years, there's speculation it may eventually be taken over by another operator and Baylor could resume its former relationship with either Methodist or St. Luke's.

Either outcome could help clear the way for a merger with Rice, a possibility that was recently touted by Rice President David Leebron as having the potential to create a national powerhouse that would greatly benefit Houston. Leebron has said that figuring out how a hospital would fit into a union was one of the issues that would require study.

The pairing of Rice and Baylor is so logical and promising that the medical school's trustees should not let the likely replacement of its president delay merger discussions. If former Baylor President Dr. William Butler steps back into the role of interim as school sources expect, he should set as a top priority guiding the talks with Rice to a successful conclusion.
It now seems clear that Baylor's acrimonious parting with Methodist was a mistake that did no favors for the participants or their host city. In replacing its leadership, Baylor now has a chance to remedy some poorly thought out past decisions with a course change.

A union between the top private university in Texas and one of the nation's premier medical schools is a once-in-an-academic-lifetime opportunity. Officials of both institutions must make sure it is not lost.